INFLUENZA

Present day Homoeopathic treatment

It is a very vast question. I will not take the time of my readers for presenting a complicated work compiled from the Materia Medica, Such an work would not be of any interest to the readers. I will try to give a practical study of a question which is in full evolution not only since one hundred years while Homoeopathy existed but it continues to develop still to-day. The informations regarding the evolution will not help us to take a stand face to face with the disease. We should wait. There are persons who explain the ground and go forward, there are others whose mission is to organise the grounds discovered ; the last mission, I think, is that which is reserved for us practitioners ; we should try to understand and to put gradually to the point all the new elements which are brought forward every year in the Homoeopathic Materia Medica.

At present we are to answer the question : HOW SHOULD ONE PROCEED TO TREAT INFLUENZA taking into account at the same time the good tradition and the new elements, which are since sometime confirmed!

in practice-

After this introduction we are going to lunch ourselves into the treatment.

We will divide the treatment into three parts of which the most important will be the first and the fourth-

In the first group we will study the etiological remedies and the nosodes which may be used preventively or in course of the disease. This first part is very important as it offers us some philosophical views on the whole of the first part-

The second part contains the treatment of ordinary influenza and of the first phase which develops for a few days without complications, As regards the second part, though less important, we would like to give only a simple chart which will not teach you anything, It will help you have some notions clarified and classified.

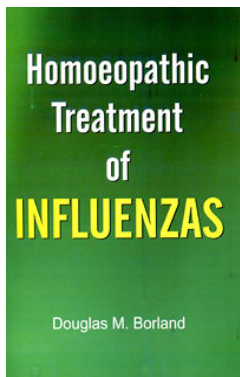

The third part, however very interesting, will not be the object of a long study. This part will give you the treatment of the phase of localisations and complications of influenza. It will be useful to explain at length this part of the treatment of influenza but the readers will find them in books whatever we may say on this subject : We will only make a classification of the principal

General Consideration on Influenza

Before the study of these four parts we are going to give at first some generalities.

Influenza is a disease which rages continually, but which, besides its epidemic and endemic forms, comes every 15 or 30 years of interval and takes the character of a plague having the character of great epidemic more or less terrible.

From the point of view of the treatment, let us say that practically there exists very little difference between the treatment of ordinary influenza which is endemic and the cases of epidemics. It is necessary to know that the influenza is a disease which may take all possible forms. Because of this character it seems to us impossible to discover for it a panacea, a unique treatment- We will be forced to find out all possible arms of all possible therapeutics, even to introduce new arms when the classical homoeopathic remedies are not enough. We should have therefore to have numerous remedies and put them at play, more particularly in the complications. We will therefore have a very open mind in order to understand how one should make the treatment of influenza in all its forms.
