PREFACE BY THE AUTHOR,	iv—ix
PREFACE BY THE TRANSLATOR,	x—xvii

INTRODUCTION.

Review of physic, allopathy, and palliative treatment of the old school—Laymen also found treatment by means of similitude of effect to be most beneficial—Even ancient physicians had a presentiment of the superiority of that principle and Foot-notes to the Introduction, 1-63

TEXT OF THE ORGANON.

1-2.	The only calling of the physician is to cure speedily, gently, and permanently, 65 Note—It is not his calling to frame theoretical explanations.
3-4.	The physician should discover what is to be cured in diseases, and what is curative in drugs, and to adapt the latter to the former—He should also know how to prevent sickness, 65-66
5.	Attention to incidental and primary causes, and to other circumstances, 66
6.	As it concerns the physician, the disease consists only of the totality of symptoms, 67 Note—It is impossible for the old school to discover the essence of disease (prima causa).
7.	In obedience to these conditions (§ 5), the physician has only to remove the totality of symptoms in order to cure the disease, 68 Note.—Every self-evident cause of disease is to be removed. Objection to symptomatic treatment, directed only to one symptom.
8.	When all symptoms have been removed, the disease is essentially cured, 70 Note.—This is denied by the old school.
9.	During health the organism is animated by a spiritlike force (autocratic vital force), which maintains the harmony of functions, 71	71
10.	The organism is dead without this spiritlike force 71
11.	In disease the vital force is primarily affected, and expresses its suffering (inner change) by abnormal functions and feelings of the organism. 71 Note.—For the purpose of treatment, it is unnecessary to know how the vital force produces symptoms

12. By removing the complex of symptoms by means of treatment, the suffering of the vital force, that is, the whole internal and external disease is cured, 72
13. The old school was wrong in declaring non-surgical diseases to be owing to a peculiar substance pervading the system. 73
14. Every curable disease becomes apparent by means of symptoms, 73
15. The disturbance of the vital force, and consequent symptoms are an inseparable unit, 73
16. The dynamic vital force can only be morbidly affected and cured by dynamic (spiritlike) effects of morbific agencies, 74
17. The physician cures the whole disease, by removing totality of symptoms 74
Note.—Illustrative examples.
18. The totality of symptoms constitutes the only indication for the selection of a remedy,
19. A change in health (symptoms of disease) is cured by medicines, only because these are also capable producing a change of health,
20. The power of medicines of changing health, is only by observed in their effect upon health individuals,
21. Symptoms produced by medicines, are the only signs by which their curative power is recognizable.
22. If experience proves that diseases, are effectually cured by medicines of similar effect, we should choose these. If experience proves medicines of opposite effect to most effectual, we choose the latter,
Note.—The use of drugs which bear no pathological relation to the disease, but which affect the system in another manner, is the allopathic, objectionable method of treatment.
23. Protracted diseases are not cured by opposite drug-effects (antipathic),
- 24-25. Only the homoeopathic method of treatment by means of similar symptoms, is proved by experience to most effectual,
26. This is based upon the law of nature, that in the living organism a weaker dynamic affection is permanently extinguished by a stronger one, differing in kind,
Note.—This is the case in physical diseases, as well as in moral affections.

CONTENTS

27.	The curative property of medicines, therefore, rests upon the similitude of their symptoms to those of the disease,	82
28-29.	Attempt at an explanation of this law of cure, 82-83 Note.—Illustration of the same.
30-33.	The human organism is more prone to the effects of medicine than to natural disease, . . .	84-86
34-35.	The validity of the homoeopathic law of cure is demonstrated by the failure of unhomoeopathic treatment of protracted diseases, and also by the fact that two dissimilar morbid processes in the system do not cancel each other,	86-87
36.	I. The older affection, being of equal or superior intensity to the new one, will exclude the latter, . . .	87
37.	Under non-homoeopathic treatment of mild nature, chronic diseases remain unchanged, . . .	88
38.	II. A new and intenser disease may while it lasts, suppress the older dissimilar disease; but it will not remove it permanently, . . .	89-92
39.	Violent treatment with allopathic medicines cures no chronic disease, it will only suppress it during the action of the medicine, which produces no symptoms similar to the disease—The chronic disease returns afterwards in aggravated form, . . .	92-95
40.	The new disease may finally join the older and dissimilar one, thus producing a double or complicated disease, neither of which is capable of cancelling the other,	95-97
41.	More frequently than in the natural course of diseases, affections resulting from improper and prolonged allopathic treatment, are made to complicate natural disease, or to aggravate them, . . .	97
42.	Disease thus complicated, being dissimilar, occupy different localities in the organism, . . .	98
43-44.	The result is very different, when an intenser disease joins a similar one pre-existing in the organism, the latter is cured by the former, . . .	99
45.	Explanation of this process.....	100
46.	Examples of chronic diseases cured by the accidental addition of new similar and intenser disease, 100-106
47-49.	Of two diseases meeting in the course of nature, only the -similar one will cure the other; dissimilar ones do not. This indicates that we should use only similar remedies (homoeopathic) in the treatment of disease,	106-107
50.	There are but few natural diseases that will cure others

- homœopathically, and such effects are connected with many inconveniences, 107
51. The physician, on the other hand, possesses numerous remedies, far superior to the accidental cures of nature, 108
52. From the process of nature we learn that diseases should be treated and cured only with homœopathic remedies, while allopathic remedies are ineffectual and injurious, 109-111
- 53-54. There are only three possible methods of applying medicines in disease, 111-112
1. The homœopathic method, which is the only efficacious one, 111
55. 2. The allopathic or heteropathic method, 112
56. 3. The antipathic (enantipathic) palliative method, 112-113
- Note.—The attempt called "isopathy."
57. The method of treatment, according to which a remedy of opposite effect (contraria contrariis) is employed against a single symptom of the disease, US-114
58. The antipathic method is wrong, not only because it treats a single symptom of a disease, but also because it is followed by aggravation after apparent relief in protracted diseases, 114-115
- Note.—Testimony of authors.
59. Injurious effect of certain antipathic treatment, 115-119
60. Increased and repeated doses of a palliative, never cure chronic diseases, but tend to aggravate them, 119-120
61. These results should have led physicians to the recognition of the opposite and only efficacious homœopathic method, 120-121
62. The reason of the injuriousness of the palliative, and of the efficacy of homœopathic treatment, 121
63. This principle is founded on the difference of primary effect of each medicine upon the organism, and the counter or aftereffect produced by the vital force, 121-122
64. Illustration of primary and after-effect, 122
65. Examples of both, 123-124
66. The after-effect of the vital force becomes apparent only through the restitution of the equilibrium of health, after the minutest homœopathic doses, 124
67. These truths illustrate the efficacy of the homœopathic, as well as the injuriousness of the antipathic (palliative) methods, 124-125
- Note.—Cases in which the antipathic method of treatment is alone efficacious.

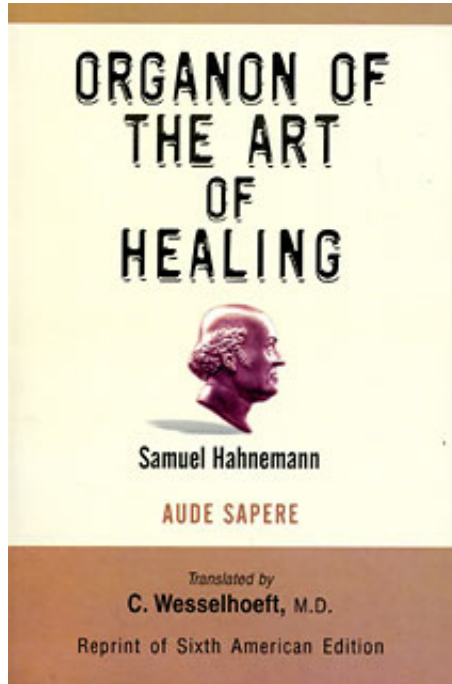

CONTENTS

68.	These truths establish the efficacy of the homoeopathic method of treatment.....	126
69.	These truths prove the injuriousness of the antipathic method,	126-129
	Note 1.—Sensations of opposite kind are not neutralized in the sensory system of the human body, thus differing from substances of opposite kind in chemistry.
	Note 2.—Illustrative example.
70.	Short definition of the homoeopathic system,	130-132
71.	The three necessary conditions for curing are: 1. The investigation of the disease. 2. The investigation of the effects of medicines. 3. Their appropriate application,	132
72.	General view of diseases, acute and chronic,	132-133
73.	Acute diseases of single individuals; sporadic, epidem and acute miasms,	133-135
74.	The most intractable form of chronic disease, is that produced by unskillful allopathic treatment,	135-137
75.	These are most incurable,	137
76.	Only when there remains sufficient vital force, the lesion may be repaired in time, while the original disease is treated homœopathically,	137-138
77.	Diseases which are improperly called chronic,	138
78.	Genuine chronic diseases, all of them originate in chronic miasms,	138-139
79.	Syphilis and sycosis,	139
80-81.	Psora, it is the source of all genuine chronic diseases, excepting the syphilitic and sycotic,	139-142;
	Note.—Nomenclature Of common pathology.
82.	The more specific remedies for chronic miasms, especially for psora, should, in a given case, be selected with special case to effect a cure,	143-145
83.	The conditions necessary for the perfection of a record (picture) of a case of disease,	145
84-99.	Directions how to make inquiry into a case of disease, and how to record it,	145-155
	The investigation of epidemic diseases,	155-158
103.	The fundamental cause of unsyphilitic chronic diseases, as well as the great general outlines of psora, were discovered and recorded in the same manner,	158
104.	Advantages of written records of cases, for the purpose of cure, and observation during treatment,	159-160
	Note.—How physicians of the old school proceed in examining a case of disease,	105-114.
	Premonitions regarding the investigation of pure drug-

	effects upon the healthy—Primary and secondary effect,	160-167
115.	Alternating effects of drugs	169
116-117.	Idiosyncrasies,	167-169
118-119.	Each: medicine differs in effect from others,	169-170
	Note.—There are no surrogates.
120.	Each drug should be tested carefully with regard to its peculiar effects,	171
121-140.	How to proceed when testing drugs upon other persons,	171-182
141.	Those tests of drugs are most reliable, which a healthy physician makes upon himself,	182-183
142.	The investigation of pure drug-effects in disease is difficult,	184
143-145.	It is only this testing of medicines upon persons in health, that leads to a true materia medic 184-187
146.	The most appropriate method of applying medicines tested with regard to their pure effects,	187
147.	The most homœopathically adapted medicines is the most efficacious, and the specific remedy	187
148.	Indications as to how the homoeopathic cure is effected,	187-188
149.	Homoeopathic cures of acute diseases are rapid, those of chronic diseases require proportionally more time,
188-190	Note.—Difference between pure homoeopathy and mixed practice.
150.	Slight indispositions,	190
151.	Strongly marked diseases have numerous symptoms, 190
152.	It is less difficult to find the homoeopathic remedy for diseases presenting a number of symptoms [^]	190
153.	What kind of symptoms are especially to be noticed. 191
154.	A very homoeopathic remedy cures without causing noticeable discomfort,	192
155.	The reason why such cures are free from discomfort, 192
156.	The causes of slight exceptions to this rule,	193
157-160.	The medicinal affection which is very similar, but somewhat superior to the original disease in intensity, is called the homoeopathic aggravation ,	193-195
161.	In chronic (psoric) diseases, homoeopathic aggravations of antipsoric medicines appear in the course of several days, from time to time.	196
162-171.	Rules to be followed in case the stock of known remedies is too small to admit of finding a perfect homoeopathic remedy,	196-200
172-184.	Rules to be followed in the treatment of diseases presenting a scarcity of symptoms one-sided diseases 201-205

185-203.	Treatment of diseases with local symptoms; their external treatment is always injurious,	205-215
204-205.	All genuine chronic diseases (not resulting from, and maintained only by improper habits), are to be treated only by internal homoeopathic remedies, adapted to the miasms from which the diseases sprang,
216-218
206. .	Inquiry should always be instituted regarding the fundamental miasm, whether it be simple or complicated	with a second (or even a third),	218-
220
207.	Inquiries concerning previous treatment,	220
208-209.	Other necessary preliminary inquiries before recording; a chronic disease.	220-221
210-230.	Treatment of so-called mental diseases,	221-232
231-232.	Intermittent and alternating diseases,	233
233-234.	Typical intermittent diseases,	234
235-244.	Intermittent fevers,	235-241
245-251.	The mode of administration of medicines-,	242-252
	Note.—Repetition of doses.
252-256.	Signs of incipient improvement,	252
257-258.	Cautions against favorite remedies, and prejudices against others,.....	255-256
259-261.	The regimen in chronic diseases,	256-257
	Note.—Injurious habits and abuses.
262-263.	Diet in acute diseases,	253
264-266.	The selection of active and genuine drugs,	259
	Note.—By preparation, some medicinal substances become articles of diet.
267.	The preparation of the most efficacious and durable form of medicinal substances from freshly gathered plants,	260
268.	Dry vegetable substances	261
	Note.—Pulverized preparations for preservation.
269-271.	The method peculiar to homoeopathy of preparing crude medicinal substances for the purpose of developing their curative properties to the highest degree. 262-264
272-274.	But a single, simple medicine is to be administered to the patient at a time.	264-206
275-278.	Quantity of the dose for homoeopathic use—The increase and diminution of the dose, its potentiation.
266-268
288-292.	The parts of the booty which are more or less susceptible of the effects of medicines,	276-278
	Note.—Advantages of olfaction of highly attenuated medicine over other methods.
	Appendix on animal magnetism,.....	281-282
	Notes and explanatory remarks on the same,
