Preface

THE SYSTEM of Biochemic treatment with Schiessler's Twelve Tissue Remedies seems to be gaining popularity in certain parts of this country.

The author in his earlier life had no interest in the science of medicine but rather held that it was best left to the medical profession. Man is however a creature of circumstances and the proved efficacy of the Tissue Remedies created a strong faith in this system.

The first experience was the wonderful cure of asthma, which prevented sleep and made the patient sit up in bed the whole night in great distress. A single dose of one of the Tissue Remedies (Kali phos.), given to the attending Allopathic physician by a friend, brought instantaneous relief to all the sufferings as if by magic and the patient lay flat and slept without any trouble.

After this occurrence, the author obtained successful results from the use of these remedies. A whitlow, which had suppurated, had all the pus absorbed in the course of a night by only two doses of Silicea 6x. Eczema on the eyebrows yielded quickly to Natrum mur. 3x internally and externally. Chronic asthma of long standing was relieved by Biochemic treatment and the patient acknowledged the benefit although he had taken the medicines without any faith.

Hemiplegia following an apoplectic fit was given up by an allopath as hopeless and a homeopath would not take up the case and said that nothing short of a miracle could effect a cure. The author came to hear of the trouble during a visit to the place on some business and advised Kali phos. 3x internally in frequent doses and also locally. The paralyzed arm showed signs of movement within twenty-four hours and a cure was effected in three days—the result was miraculous, as admitted by the allopath himself, when he met the author.

Another case of asthma was promptly relieved by Magnesia phos. 3x. As the patient was suffering from phthisis, the same remedy with Natrum phos. was prescribed in frequent doses. After about a month of this treatment, with change of air at a sea-side station, the patient gained in health and in weight. Subsequently he discontinued the treatment and brought about a relapse by indiscretion in food.

Another case of asthma of long standing was treated with Magnesia phos. 3x and Silicea 12x and the action of these remedies was said to be as prompt as the allopathic injections.

An interesting case deserves special mention, although after the diagnosis was made by the author from the tongue symptoms indicated in Biochemistry, allopathic physicians took it up as a "classical case." Peculiar complaints, loss of smell, loss of taste, loss of sensibility in the head, were taken by an eminent allopathic doctor to be due to hysteria. The author observed cracks on the tongue, which according to Biochemistry are indications of a deficiency of Calcarea fluor. Starting from the key-notes of that remedy, tumour or bony growth, the author inferred that there was real mischief in the cervical spine, where a tumour or bony growth had formed and exerted pressure at the nerve-roots, thus putting a nerve or nerves out of action. X-ray photographs were taken and the concluding sentence of the report was that all the troubles were due to the pressure exerted at the nerve-roots by the bony growth. It is indeed a marvellous achievement of Biochemistry that the tongue should tell the tale of a cell-salt deficiency in the human organism and lead to a correct diagnosis in a difficult case.

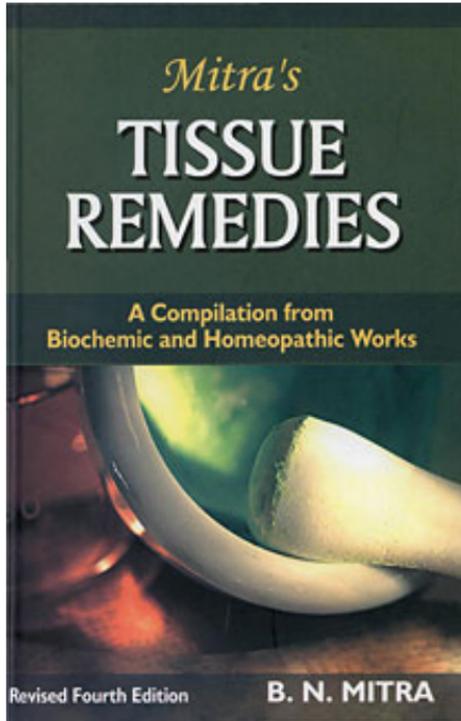

In the proper selection of Biochemic remedies, the author had to refer to several books, most of which were in three parts, Materia Medica, Therapeutics and Repertory and in order to save time and trouble, he prepared for his personal use a compilation arranged on a rational basis but had no intention of publication. Some of his friends, however, found it useful as a book of reference and pressed that the public should have the benefit of his labours and this publication is solely due to the wishes of such friends.

The author acknowledges his indebtedness to the undermentioned Biochemic and Homeopathic books, from which this book has been Compiled :
