PART II

THE HOMOEOPATHIC TREATMENT PROPER

Two different methods may be admissible for the exposition of this treatment. The one consisting in the multiple forms of constipation and the designation of the medicines adapted to each of these forms according to their symptomatic shadings; this method may, perhaps, be more scientific in the practical and ordinary sense of the word, but we do not propose to adopt it here.

We prefer the method of the individual study of the principal medicines adapted to the cure of constipation. With each of these remedies we shall, nevertheless, endeavor to determine as accurately as possible their characteristic sphere of action by references to clinical observations in support of their efficacy. We shall by this means lessen the difficulties which may be attributed to our method, which conforms with the spirit of the homoeopathic doctrine, and especially to the teachings of our illustrious founder. We shall endeavor, however, to satisfy, by a practical resume, the objections more or less well founded of the partisans of the first method.

AESCULUS HIPPOCASTANUM

Stools: Large, dry, hard, difficult, dark; In the form of balls; First part hard, black, the last of about natural consistency, but white as milk; Hard, knotty, dry, and white. (See Nux v.)

Before Stool: Constant desire; Sensation as if a foreign body was in the rectum, or as if the rectum was full of small sticks, with fruitless efforts at evacuation, and violent pains through the hips and sacrum; Heat and contraction of the rectum, with a sensation as if it was prolapsed, dryness and itching of the anus, with tension of the mucous membranes and the neighboring integuments; Pain, constriction, weight, prickings and itching, with tenesmus of the rectum and anus, the pains irradiate to the posterior surface of the body.

During Stool: Continuation of many of the symptoms enumerated above. Sensation as if the intestine was obstructed by folds of mucous membrane, which were threatening to rupture under the efforts at defecation; Haemorrhoids with a slight bloody discharge but with intense pain; Inability to expel the stool from weakness of the rectum; Shivering while at stool.
