ABSINTHIUM

Characteristics of the patient

Another form of 'worm wood', Absinthium is of interest as a medicine. You will find its usefulness from cases of its abuse as a drink. It produces damaging results like delirium and epileptic spasms.

Patient is haunted by hallucinations. He is susceptible to frightful visions. During these conditions he develops an irresistible tendency to steal, though for no apparent reason.

Mental conditions

He is forgetful. Does not remember things that have taken place recently. His approach to life is brutal. He is generally a nervous type of person.

Physical symptoms

If such a patient becomes a victim of spermatorrhoea with relaxed parts, you can think of Absinthium.

You will find pain in the back after intercourse. There will be oozing of white substance from glans.

His desire for sex increases. Erections will be mechanical and painful.

Dr. Kent states with confidence that this medicine can cure gonorrhoea. A patient waits for

There is practically absence of erections. Completely impotent. Parts are cold and relaxed. Absolute loss of desire. (You can consider: Selen., Con., and Sabad. also).

The emissions will be minimum and without any ejaculation,

Gonorrhoeal patients will have a gleet discharge.

Testicles will be cold, swollen and painful.

Dr. Hering observes complete loss of sexual desire in Agnus patients. He says that penis will remain small, flaccid and cold. He finds hardness of testicles. He adds that voluptuous thoughts will not bring on any erections.

Dr. J.T. Kent suggests this remedy in advanced neurasthenia. Dr. E.A. Farrington finds it very useful when the mind is greatly depressed. He advocates it for spermatorrhoea of sinners and adds that sexual appetite will be completely gone in them.

Comparing this condition with those of other medicines he observes that Calc. ostreorum is useful where the sexual desire is more of a mental state than a physical condition. The recognising factor is that a man (after an abuse of this kind) would settle down to a moral and quiet life.

Dioscorea is also very effective where there is excessive loss of semen, with weakness of legs, especially about knees.
